In 1970, Neiman moved to Boulder, and in 1969, with some of his college-aged siblings, he founded NEMA International. He got a Ph.D. in electrical engineering from Stanford in 1977, took a teaching job at the University of California, Berkeley and, following publication of "Beyond the Atomic Bomb," started his own consulting company in Colorado: JMW, the Neiman name for the name of the consulting firm he founded, and JMW International. I interviewed Neiman, who is now president of the Nuclear Materials and Energy Association in Boulder, Colorado, in May 2014. On May 28, 2014, the Nuclear Materials and Energy Association, the world's largest non-governmental nuclear organization, held its annual meeting, hosted by the Brookings Institution and the University of Utah, and held an event in which Neiman was president. At that time Neiman told me, according to the story of his autobiography, Atomic, that he had a feeling that the day would come that the world understood why the atomic energy community had never really had much success on environmental issues.

At that time, the U.S. was still in the dark about the potential impact of nuclear weapons on the environment. The book came out two years after a bombing at Bikini atoll caused about 300,000 people to leave their homes. It was a major step in the right direction toward better environmental thinking and, eventually, an outright ban on the use of nuclear weapons. Siren movie hindi free download
